

Commands

echo -

a messenger that delivers your words to the terminal date -

date command is used to display the system date and time allows you to check for memory RAM on your system or to check the memory statics of the Linux operating system.

Free -

uname -

prints information about a Linux machine's operating system and hardware platform history -

provides a chronological list of previously executed commands, along with corresponding command numbers.

man -

provides reference information on topics, such as commands, subroutines, and files

apt -

a command-line tool for managing packages on Debian-based Linux distributions snap -

gathers system configuration information and compresses the information into a pax file flatpak -

the primary Flatpak command, to which specific commands are appended